OECD Study on Illicit Financial Flows from Developing Countries

The OECD has found that huge sums of money leave developing countries illegally. OECD countries can do more to stop these flows by adhering to their own rules and by implementing best practices.

This briefing reveals how stopping illicit financial flows is possible and essential for keeping more resources in developing countries.

Microfinance and the illusion of development

Milford Bateman and Ha-Joon Chang studied the contemporary model of microfinance. They argue that microfinance actually constitutes a powerful institutional and political barrier to sustainable economic and social development, and so also to poverty reduction. They suggest in their article that microfinance programs serve the neoliberal/globalisation agenda.

Undue credit: Are France, Germany and Japan subverting the definition of aid?

Last April, former OECD Development Assistance Committee chair Richard Manning revealed how donors were inflating their aid totals by including loans that would profit the donors if paid in full.

In recent years, a few donors, notably France, Germany and Japan, have pushed along that slippery slope, increasing their aid totals and riling their peers.

the Development Policies

During the past years, the development policies and the global development agenda have suffered important transformations that have led to a redefinition of the strategic role of the different development actors. One of the actors who is feeling the reconfiguration more intensively is civil society and its organisations. They are being incorporated into new dynamics that affect the way they participate in relevant areas of the development policies and the development agenda. In this paper, we analyse some of the most relevant trends in each of these areas.
