

In times of crisis, citizens expect their politicians and governments to act. Estimates predict that unemployment could rise up to 25 million within the EU alone, with poverty and social exclusion also increasing. Progressive civil society must remind the rest of society that it is time for a change: for investment in social infrastructure, in a new global deal and a real economy which is driven by the needs of the world population and respecting the environment.

The Czech government, which is holding the EU Presidency, has lost a confidence vote in the national Parliament. This begs the question: in whose name is the Czech government actually speaking? We also see the high number of people who are worriedly looking to the future of the Lisbon Treaty: there is not only the next referendum in Ireland, but also the pending decision of the German Constitutional Court and the pending ratifications in Poland and the Czech Republic. G20 PLEDGES HELP TO DEVELOPING COUNTRIES AND ACTION ON TAX HAVENS, BUT FEW SIGNS OF REAL REFORM

The G20 Summit of leaders concluded yesterday with some progress on the question of tax havens and a recognition that developing countries will need extra help, but no major ground was broken on the key causes of the crisis facing the world today nor was the social investment required to aid those affected by the crisis forthcoming.

Amongst the key conclusions, they agreed to an extra $1.1 trillion to be made available for the International Financial Institutions (IFIs). Of this, $50 billion will be provided to "support social protection, boost trade and safeguard development in low-income countries", however there is no timetable for spending this. Whilst welcome, this money forms only a small percentage of the estimated $216 billion financing gap developing countries will face as a result of the crisis in 2009 alone, according to IMF estimates. An extra $250 billion will be provided in IMF Special Drawing Rights, with some $19 billion going to low-income countries. Read more...
