In the year since Vladimir Putin was re-elected president, Russia's government has passed numerous laws – often at breakneck speed – to lock down civil society. It's the worst crackdown on rights in Russia in the post-Soviet era.

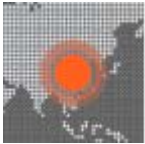

Several of the new laws aim to limit, or even end, independent advocacy. One restricts foreign funding and contact with foreigners. Another essentially bans funding that originates in the United States for "political" groups and bans groups that work "against Russia's interests." The laws go so far as to label these groups "foreign agents" – synonymous with spy and traitor in Russia. More laws restrict Internet content and public demonstrations.

Meanwhile, pro-government media runs propaganda depicting critics of the government as dangerous enemies.

In Turkey, Justice Central to Kurdish Peace Process

Justice for the thousands of state-perpetrated killings and disappearances of Kurdish civilians in the 1990s should be an essential part of Turkey's peace process. The country's 20-year time limit on criminal investigations for murder means that without urgent action there may soon be obstacles to pursuing justice.

In Guatemala, Genocide Trial Suspension

For years the case of former de facto head of Guatemala, Efraín Ríos Montt, and others like him have been delayed by dilatory maneuvers and acts of intimidation against victims and justice officials alike. This surprise ruling represents another setback for victims who have been seeking justice.
