Witness: Trapped in His Own Apartment – Kolya's Story

For many 19-year-olds, the world is a place of growing possibilities and increasing independence. Not for Nikolai Titkov. Thin and pale, he spends nearly all day, every day, in bed. Pushed against a wall in his narrow bedroom, the bed is a jumble of blankets and pillows with a table strewn with medicines at its foot. When he was 5, Nikolai – or Kolya as his mother, Tatiana, calls him – was diagnosed with a condition in which his muscles waste away. Over the years, he has lost his ability to walk, write, or bathe himself – relying on Tatiana to care for most of his needs.

Even when Kolya does get out of bed, a dangerous exercise given how brittle his bones are, he cannot move around easily. The Titkov's municipal apartment is cramped, with narrow corridors that make maneuvering between rooms in a wheelchair all but impossible.

In March, Russia will host the Winter Paralympic Games. But many people with disabilities in Russia are struggling.

Dispatches: What Putin Didn't Tell the American People

By Anna Neistat

It's not what Vladimir Putin's New York Times op-ed says that's so worrisome; it's what it doesn't say. As a Russian and as someone who has been to Syria multiple times since the beginning of the conflict to investigate war crimes and other violations, I would like to mention a few things Putin overlooked...

In California, Second Chance for Youth Offenders

California law does not recognize what every parent and teacher knows: children are different from adults. If passed into law, this bill will help put many young offenders on a path to being productive members of society.
