Last February, the Mexican government announced that it was revising and updating a database of more than 26,000 people who had been reported missing or "disappeared." The current database has many inconsistencies and incomplete data, and lacks the names of many people reported disappeared.

The government still needs to live up to this promise. It should also launch serious investigations to search for the disappeared and bring those responsible to justice.

Mexico has no national system that allows states to share and search for information on missing persons – or to alert police and check hospitals, prisons, and other institutions when someone has disappeared. The lack of such a registry has also made it difficult to determine the scale of disappearances nationwide.

Australia must not look the other way on Sri Lanka

by Elaine Pearson
Sydney Morning Herald

When Sri Lankan authorities detained Australian Greens Senator Lee Rhiannon for publicly criticising their human rights record, it reinforced why Sri Lanka is a poor choice of host for the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting.

News that US intelligence services tapped the phones of allied leaders has generated understandable outrage in Europe. But far more significant is the American government's practice of monitoring the communications of millions of ordinary people, who have no legal redress in the United States because they are foreigners.

In Syria, Widespread Use of Incendiary Weapons

Syria has used incendiary weapons to inflict terrible harm on civilians, including many children. Yet where is the international outcry? Other countries should condemn Syria's use of incendiary weapons just as they have its use of chemical weapons and cluster bombs.

In the US, a Catch-22 for Asylum Seekers

The US government leaves many asylum seekers little choice other than begging or working illegally to survive. The work and aid restrictions imposed on asylum seekers, apparently to discourage frivolous applications, harm and degrade the very people who most need support and protection.
